

CREDIT REPORT Dispute Kit

If you believe your credit report is inaccurate and need to dispute reported items, follow these steps to insure your rights are protected under the Fair Credit Reporting Act and to hold the credit bureaus and creditors responsible for any possible claims you may have.

1. Obtain a copy of your credit report from each of the three credit bureaus, TransUnion, Experian, and Equifax.

If you have not obtained a credit report within the last year, you can request one for free using the attached Form #1. You only need to mail one copy of this form. You must include a copy of your driver's license and a utility bill for identity verification.

If you feel there are items that may be in dispute, it is best to request the credit reports by mail because the fine print on some Internet credit report websites may force you to waive some of your rights.

2. If you have already obtained a credit report within the last year, you will need 3 separate requests, one to each credit bureau, using a separate copy for each request of the attached Form #2. Include a check for $8, a copy of your driver's license, and a utility bill for identity verification with each request.
3. Once you receive the reports, review them for inaccuracies such as incorrect credit limits, late payments, collection items, accounts that aren't yours, etc.

4. For all inaccurate items, gather as much documentation as possible to support your dispute (canceled checks, bank statements, payoffs, bankruptcy discharge, etc.)
5. Fill out the Credit Report Dispute (Form #3) and attach copies of all the supporting documentation you gathered.

Fill out a separate dispute to each credit bureau. For example, if all three reports are inaccurate, you will need to fill out three copies of Form #3 and make three copies of the documentation.

6. Make a copy of everything for your records including each dispute and all supporting documentation. This is very important. If they lose or don't respond to your requests, you will need a way to prove what you sent.
7. Send each dispute and supporting documentation to each credit bureau via USPS certified mail with return receipt requested. Check with the post office if you are unfamiliar with this process.
8. The credit bureaus have 30 days to send a response. In their response, they will provide an updated credit report.
9. If the bureaus refuse to remove valid disputed items, you may be able to file a lawsuit for claims against the credit bureau. Contact Culik Law for a Free Consultation to find out more.
